

SOREN GRAU

Painting each artwork to convey both personal meaning and ambiguity, Soren Grau works in two radically different styles: Neo-Expressionism and Suprematism. For his Neo-Expressionist work, Grau cites Jackson Pollock, Jean-Michel Basquiat and Clyfford Still as inspirations in both style and attitude. Grau's international success and celebrity collector base has grown rapidly.

With cultural icons and world events often acting as inspiration, he strives to communicate meaning through bold compositions, figures, and colors. Speaking about his neo-expressionist works, Grau explains "I know what I have set out to do but the details that come out in the canvas are an obscured vision of the subject...it's something you set out to do with passion."

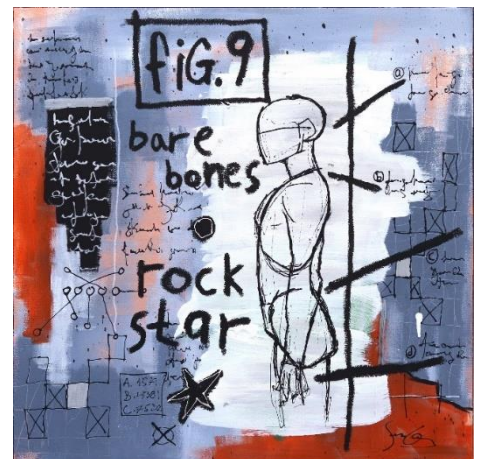

The pure pleasure of creating is the driving force behind his painting. He believes that art need not be complicated and that art is for everyone.

Originating from Denmark, Grau currently lives in Los Angeles, California. His experience in graphic design informs his compositions and methodology. However, Grau considers himself an anti-conformist and finds creating original compositions with unexpected details very fulfilling.

"Artists put a piece of their soul into an artwork," explains Grau. "Art allows you to express your individuality by creating something unique that is a part of you but can also be a part of those who see it and experience it."

Soren Grau's artworks have been collected by international companies, including Red Bull, HBO, Toyota, and FX, as well as by private art lovers and celebrities worldwide. They have been exhibited at major art fairs such as New York and Hong Kong.
